The current issue of the New School Psychology Bulletin (NSPB) is proof of the power of collective engagement. Together we assembled the pieces created by a year of uncertainty and isolation. We wholeheartedly acknowledge our good fortune and the gift of mutual support. For us, life in lockdown became more bearable thanks to NSPB. We thank the many who made this publication possible. Howard Steele, our brilliant faculty advisor, encouraged students to become a part of NSPB and always saw a bright future. Janiera Warren, an NSPB advocate, gave us her uncanny problem-solving skills. Our authors shared their work, engaged in the publication process, and waited patiently for this issue to be ready. Our editorial board worked diligently to review every submission and contributed to the high-quality work contained herein. They are the backbone of our journal. Gregory Weil held us in mind and provided guidance as needed. Alyson Aladro's distinctive cover design hallmarks this issue. We consider the minds of our readers and are humbled to produce a journal that piques their curiosity and holds their interest. We are indebted to the Psychology Department of the New School for Social Research for providing financial support. It is with heartfelt appreciation that we say thank you.
